About Library

Exim Bank of India represents a rare case of an institution where the concept and need for such an institution had been debated for a long period-more than two decades - before it was finally set up in 1982. The two decades prior to the establishment of Exim Bank witnessed significant changes in the industrial and the trade scenario. Indian exports during the fifties and the early sixties consisted of primary commodities and traditional manufactures like jute and cotton textiles. The dominant viewpoint was that in India's case, expansion in domestic demand alone could realistically serve as the engine for economic growth, since export expansion opportunities were limited and there were
